

I should not miss accountability because it shows a lack of responsibility. Missing accountability causes unneeded stress and work for those responsible for my well being such as my fellow wingman, and the permanent party, Military Training Leaders. Being late to an accountability session will be letting down my fellow wingman and not being a good wingman to them because they will have to report it, making more work for them, thus being an inconvenience to their evening.

Missing accountability is a problem that should not happen, because by missing accountability you will be causing more unnecessary issues and (or) problems. The unnecessary issues and problems that come with missing accountability includes inconveniencing the permanent party member, military training leaders.

The issue isn't just inconveniencing them, it is how I am inconveniencing them. If someone was to miss an accountability session or run late to check-in (CaC in), it would mean that the particular airman's status is unknown. If an airman's status is unknown, there will be numerous factors that would be brought to mind as to why that certain individual did not attend accountability on time, or did not meet the accountability window. Certain example possibilities to be the reason an airman did not make accountability can be the airman has gone AWOL (absent without leave), the possibility of suicide, the possibility of being kidnapped, or even killed.

Due to the fact that the dorm CQ, and military training leaders have no way other than accountability to know the basic status of the airman, if an accountability is missed, military training leaders may have to be contacted and proceed back to the triangle to find and see as to why that certain individual has missed accountability.

Missing accountability can be considered as selfish, because in the event that a military training leader has to be called down to investigate as to where the missing airman is, and if that airman is alive.

CQ and military training leaders have their own lives to live, and if someone was to miss accountability, it can pull CQ and the military training leaders away from their personal lives, or add unnecessary work. For example, missing accountability in the morning will mean holding up both Holbrook hall, Smith Hall and everyone within from continuing with their day. CQ, airman leaders, and (or) military training leaders will have to then search for the certain individual and find out if that airman is alive and “ok”. Another example is if an airman whose status is awaiting further instructions was to miss an accountability mid-day, then the airman and military training leaders who are in charge of overseeing airmen who are awaiting further instructions will have to search for that pertaining individual to see if he is alive and “ok”. In the meantime, while searching for said individual, everyone else who showed up to the “awaiting further instructions” accountability will have to wait for the individual to be found and report in. A final example of how missing accountability can inconvenience, put stress onto, and give unnecessary work to military training leaders and the airmen who also work monitoring our well-being is night check-in accountability. If someone was to miss the check-in window for the CaC-in accountability, it means for CQ to search as to what room the airman resides in, and to go to that room and find if the airman is alive and well. This can also cause a military training leader to be called in to see where the airman is, and why that particular individual did not make the night CaC-in accountability window.
